

Johns Hopkins Summer Institute on Health Equity Research

July 13–14, 2016 | Baltimore, MD

Who should attend:

This activity is intended for

- Academic researchers (pre-doctoral students, post-doctoral fellows, junior faculty) and other scientists and staff engaged in health disparities/health equity research
- Health care professionals
- Public health professionals
- Public policy professionals
- Community members
- Members of community-based and faith-based organizations
- Leadership and policy makers (including at NIH, AHRQ, CDC, CMS, SAMHSA, HRSA and Office of Minority Health)

Disparities in health and health care have significant implications not only for the well-being of specific groups (often defined by race or socioeconomic status), but also for overall population health and healthcare costs. As disparities arise from a complex interplay of various factors, multi-level, evidence-based, culturally-sensitive, community-informed strategies are required to achieve equity.

This 2-day course aims to provide researchers and clinicians with a comprehensive introduction to the myriad of methods and skills required to conduct rigorous research and translate evidence-based strategies into practice and policy.

Sessions will cover topics ranging from stakeholder engagement and intervention development to research methods in social epidemiology, and will include interactive discussions, case-based examples and practical tools. Participants will also have the opportunity to work in small groups to obtain feedback on their work and projects from experienced faculty and staff.

Ultimately, this course aims to train a cadre of skilled researchers, clinicians, policy makers, and other professionals working in communities throughout the country to eliminate health and healthcare disparities.

This course is jointly provided by the Johns Hopkins Center to Eliminate Cardiovascular Health Disparities and the Johns Hopkins University Departments of Medicine and Surgery.

Johns Hopkins Summer Institute on Health Equity Research

July 13–14, 2016 | Baltimore, MD

Objectives:

After attending this activity, the participant will demonstrate the ability to:

1. Discuss how cultural competence and patient-centered communication enhance the quality and success of health disparities research.
2. Identify moral implications of common terms used in health equity research and policy literature and assess strengths and weaknesses of recent theories of social justice in health.
3. Engage community and organizational stakeholders in health disparities research.
4. Describe methods used to develop appropriate assessment and intervention materials for underserved, low-literacy and non-native English speaking populations.
5. Identify methods in social epidemiology and measures that can be utilized in health disparities research.
